Gospel Reflection – © Mary Coloe

Jesus' first 'Abba' experience is described in the scene of his Baptism. The three synoptic Gospels record this scene of Jesus' baptism by John, and all try to convey the deeply interior spiritual experience of Jesus. Historically, Jesus came from Nazareth to John, and the Gospel of John suggests that Jesus spent some time as a disciple of John before beginning his own ministry. A glance at the other three Gospels' presentation of this scene can help to identify some unique features of Luke's gospel, and therefore indicate the particular theological perspective of Luke.

Mark presents the experience as something totally private to Jesus. He is the only one to see the heavens part, and to hear the heavenly voice. Matthew and Luke bring elements of a private and public manifestation of God. Luke records, 'heaven was opened'. The use of the passive voice is a technique known as 'the Divine Passive' to indicate that this was the action of God. Since Luke omits the words from Mark that Jesus saw the heavens opened, Luke suggests that this was a public revelation. Then Luke follows Mark in having the heavenly voice speak directly to Jesus, 'You are my Son.' This suggests a private experience.

Some other elements in Luke's presentation need to be noted. Only Luke records that Jesus 'was at prayer'. Prayer will emerge as a theme of this Gospel and frequently Luke presents Jesus withdrawing from his ministry in order to spend time in prayer, or teaching his disciples to pray. This same theme continues in Luke's second volume, the Acts of the Apostles.

In Mark and Matthew, we are told that Jesus came out of the water and then the heavens opened and the Spirit came down on him. Luke omits this detail and so Jesus is standing in the water when the Spirit descends. This deliberate change to Mark indicates Luke's presentation of Jesus' baptism as a new creation. In Genesis 1:3, we read that the Spirit of God moved over the face of the waters. This same Spirit now hovers over the waters of Jesus' Baptism. This marks the dawn of a new era in Luke's theology. In Luke 16:16 we read, 'The Law and the Prophets were until John; since then the good news of the kingdom of God is preached.' Across Luke's two-volume work, there is a particular time schema:

The time of Israel (the Law and the Prophets)

The time of Jesus and the Kingdom (The Gospel)

The time of the Church (the Acts of the Apostles)

Each of these eras begins with the outpouring of God's Holy Spirit. I consider the scene of Jesus' baptism as his vocational call. From this moment, his life changes dramatically and he begins a public ministry to proclaim the in-breaking of God. This, in fact, is his experience here. He knows God as Abba, and knows himself as beloved son. From this spiritual insight, Jesus shifts his perception of God as one who reaches out with kindness and compassion to those in need, particularly the most vulnerable. It is false to imagine that Jesus comes to us with full knowledge of his calling, as if he has somewhere a heavenly diary to consult telling him all he needs to know and do. Jesus is fully human and fully divine, and to be fully human means being open to the mysterious call of God and needing to carefully ponder this mystery and work out the details in solitude and prayer.

"If the door of God's mercy is always open, even so must be the doors of our churches, the love of our communities, our parishes, our institutions, our dioceses, for when they are, we can all go out to bring this mercy of God [to those who most need it]. The Jubilee Year recalls the great door of God's mercy, but also the small doors of our churches – open to let the Lord in – or to let the Lord out, who is often the prisoner of our structures, our selfishness, and of so many things." Pope Francis
